

survive the immigration process. The level of assistance provided to asylum seekers currently stands at €320 per month for single asylum seekers.

The detailed breakdown of the amounts granted to asylum seekers are as follows<sup>11</sup>:

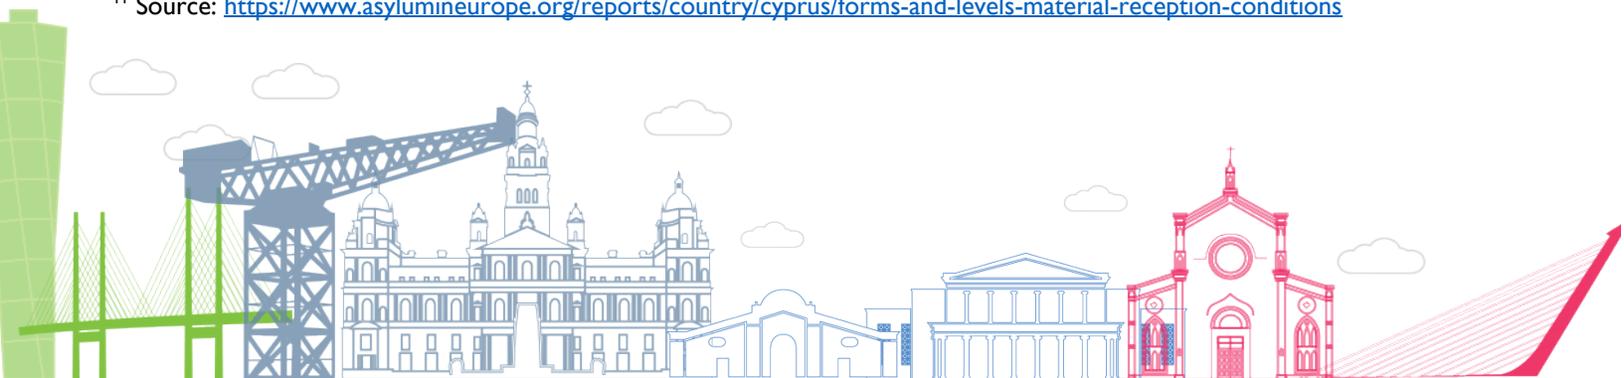

Number of persons in the family	Food, clothing and footwear (in vouchers)	Rent allowance	Allowance for electricity, water and minor expenses	Total amount of assistance granted
1	€150.00	€100.00	€70.00	€320.00
2	€225.00	€100.00	€95.00	€420.00
3	€300.00	€150.00	€130.00	€580.00
4+	€375.00	€200.00	€160.00	€735.00

The EU directive on reception stipulates that material assistance must ‘ensure a standard of living adequate for the health of applicants and sufficient to ensure their subsistence’. The amounts indicated above fail to cover the basic needs to asylum seekers, leaving them, in short, below the poverty line. It is worth mentioning that the allowance per person is significantly lower than the Guaranteed Minimum Income that is provided to Cypriot and European citizens: €480 in cash, compared to €320 in cash and vouchers for asylum seekers.

While the material assistance policy is problematic for all asylum seekers, we’ve seen that it has a more adverse effect on women. The asylum application tends to be formally submitted by the male ‘head of the family’ – with his partner and other members of the family considered as dependents – and it is he who receives and manages the cash or vouchers. By treating women as non-subjects or secondary beneficiaries who are not eligible for direct funding, the practice thus reinforces patriarchal structures.

In terms of the more practical implications, GLIMER research conducted by Christodoulou and Michael (2018) revealed examples, including one interviewee speaking about an asylum case:

<sup>11</sup> Source: <https://www.asylumineurope.org/reports/country/cyprus/forms-and-levels-material-reception-conditions>

The couple had separated and when the woman was called to the immigration office they insisted on seeing her husband as well, even though she tried to explain that their files had been separated.

The fact that the state looks to provide material assistance to the male ‘head of the family’ could be interpreted as institutional sexism. Refugee women lose their individual agency, a deeply problematic consequence when it comes to those who are victims of domestic violence. As reported by an interviewee:

I saw one woman beneficiary, she had bruises on her hands. I asked her what had happened. She refused to explain, and she used her clothes to hide them. My colleague saw the bruises too and we both knew this was due to domestic violence. She won't report it. She would be crazy to report it. She knows she won't be believed; she knows she does not have the option to leave him as she will be out on the street.

5. The Gender Dynamics of Housing Policies

Housing is directly related to the health and security of asylum seekers. When asylum seekers come to the Republic of Cyprus, they apply either for material assistance and seek private accommodation, or for accommodation at the Kofinou Reception Centre.

5.1 Private housing

Finding private accommodation in Cyprus is a very difficult task due to the relatively high cost of rent and the low availability of housing units. Much like the rest of Europe, Cypriot landlords often exhibit prejudices based on race, ethnic origin, gender and economic means (European Parliament, 2016). As mentioned, asylum seekers' rent allowance is paid directly by the Cyprus government to landlords; bureaucratic procedures often cause delays in payment, further disincentivising landlords from renting their premises to asylum seekers. These difficulties push asylum seekers towards homelessness, or low-quality/precarious housing situations. Asylum seekers often live in shared accommodation or community homes. One research participant, who works at an NGO, gave details of an instance where:

A woman was sleeping in a community space (provided by the church) with 10 men and she was reluctant to bathe due to her fear of sexual harassment or assault.

5.2 Housing for victims of trafficking

Asylum seekers who are trafficked for sexual exploitation are primarily women. 66% of detected victims were trafficked for sexual exploitation from Western and Southern Europe and 70% from Central and South-Eastern Europe. Women and girls make up 94% of victims trafficked for sexual exploitation globally and 35% of those trafficked for forced labour (Council of Europe, 2019).

In Cyprus, according to Article 47 of the Prevention, Fighting against Trafficking in and Exploitation of Human Beings and Protection of Victims Law, victims of trafficking are eligible for material assistance and rent (again paid directly to landlords), or they can stay at a shelter for trafficking victims. According to one of our interviewees, the shelter tends to be consistently at capacity, forcing social welfare officers to place women victims of trafficking wherever they can manage to find accommodation. Alternative housing arrangements are often made with no sensitivity or consideration towards the victims of trafficking:

We once had a beneficiary who told us that she was placed at [name] Hotel. This is a cheap hotel that basically works as a brothel, you know. Men were knocking on her door basically asking for sex and this accommodation was supposed to make her feel safe.

Inappropriate housing can be re-traumatising for women who have already experienced GBV. When they seek private accommodation, they are faced with the same difficulties as those we described above (challenge of finding good/secure accommodation, inadequate financial support, etc.).

5.3 The Kofinou Reception Centre

The Kofinou centre was initially designed as a place of temporary residence for asylum seekers, until they find more suitable and long-term accommodation. Up until 2017, asylum seekers were allowed to stay for three months, which was then extended to six. In a TV interview (November 2019)<sup>12</sup>, the centre's director confirmed that many asylum seekers stay much longer, sometimes up to one and a half years, due to unemployment and their inability to find affordable accommodation.

According to our interviewees, the reception centre has segregated rooms for single men and single women. Single men stay near the entrance of the reception centre complex, families in the middle and single women towards the back. Single men and women have separate toilets/bathrooms in three detached buildings (Drousiotou and Mathioudakis, 2015).

The separation of spaces for men and women is the only differentiation among asylum seekers in the reception centre (Spaneas et al, 2018). Even though the Refugee Law foresees gender-specific provisions, the centre does not seem to have any such measures or policies in place. For example, 'appropriate measures to prevent assault and gender-based violence, including sexual assault and harassment, within the premises and accommodation centres' have not been taken.

---

<sup>12</sup> Interview with AlphaNews Live. 21 November 2019. Available at https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=YigQmVAhhhE&feature=emb\_logo

The Kofinou Reception Centre. Source: in-cyprus.com

According to our interviewees, many incidents of violence against women either go unreported or are suppressed by the authorities:

There is a woman who has attempted to commit suicide three times. I know her husband is violent towards her. She lives in the centre with her husband and kids. She is a displaced migrant. The allowance is very low and it is given to him. Her life is in danger if she goes back to her country, it is in danger if she remains in the centre with him. She is trapped, she has nowhere to go, no one to talk to.

Some interviewees confirmed that poverty has pushed these women to turn to survival sex<sup>13</sup>. In the centre, their basic needs are often not covered as the benefit is only €100 per month, plus €50 for each child. According to one of our interviewees, some women who stayed in the reception centre protested this issue:

There were women who threw themselves in front of the wheels of cars protesting that they were being forced into survival sex with elderly men from the area.

---

<sup>13</sup> Survival sex is a term used to describe the engagement of people in prostitution to cover basic needs.

One of our interviewees also reported a case of someone experiencing harassment based on his gender identity at Kofinou. Neither the women's nor men's section of the reception centre accepted him. LGBTQ organisations came together to offer him a safe space in a private apartment.

5.4 The unaccompanied minors' shelters

Unaccompanied minors who arrive in the Republic of Cyprus fall under the legal guardianship of the Director of the Social Welfare Services (Refugee Law, 2000). There are four governmental shelters for unaccompanied minors run by the Social Welfare Services (SWS). Hope For Children, a local NGO, runs two more private children's shelters for the accommodation and support of unaccompanied children. The shelters are run with the approval of the SWS, who allocated funds from the European Funds Unit of the Ministry of Interior to Hope for Children for this purpose.

Alarmingly, displaced migrants who come as unaccompanied minors can only stay at these shelters until they are 18 years old. In a conference organised by UNCHR in December 2019, several refugees pointed out that this is an unfair policy as the shelter does not prepare them for the outside world. As per one of participants: 'One day I was a minor, the next day on my 18th birthday I was not a minor and I had to face the outside world and try to find my own accommodation'.

Another interviewee also spoke of the problematic nature of this policy, highlighting the extremely vulnerable situation 18-year-old refugees find themselves in once they are forced to leave the shelter. There was a case of a 19-year-old girl who soon became pregnant and did not know the father.

They were kicked out of the shelter once they turned 18. They were looking for someone to protect them, to give them a roof over their head, this is how you become vulnerable.

The Commissioner for Children's Rights published a report on unaccompanied minors in 2018 that revealed unaccompanied minors experience stress and anxiety about the outcome of their applications (asylum and/or family reunification). They do not receive sufficient information about their applications or their rights in general. They also don't receive sufficient information about what will happen to them when they reach legal adulthood, which exacerbates their feelings of anxiety and insecurity.

6. The Gender Dynamics of Language Training for Adults

Adult language training for asylum seekers and refugees has historically been offered by the state as well as the third sector. It should be noted that language courses are not aimed at asylum seekers and refugees specifically. Instead, these groups can take advantage of the general adult language classes designed for non-native speakers and third country nationals. There are three public institutions that provide this type of training: Adult Education Centres (AECs), State Institutes for Further Education (SIFEs) and the University of Cyprus (UCY). Adult language training offered by the third sector for migrants and asylum seekers is mostly undertaken by EU-funded projects under the Asylum, Migration and Integration Fund (AMIF).

Adolescents who enter the state educational system can attend transitional classes for non-Greek speakers<sup>14</sup>. If they are over 15 years of age, they can also attend language training courses offered at AECs. As language is considered key to the integration of third country nationals into Cypriot society, over recent years relevant training has been provided via partnerships between organisations from the public, third and private sectors.

With regards to gender, according to prior GLIMER research conducted by the author (Angeli, 2019), most language training programmes in Cyprus, whether they are national or third sector initiatives, are gender blind. Language training in Cyprus broadly overlooks migrant women's double role as family providers and caregivers, and the impact this role has on their availability to attend language classes. For babies and infants until the age of three, which is when pre-primary education starts, parents face the challenge of a lack of childcare facilities. The cost of both municipal and private childcare is between €200–350. For context, that is the total amount of material assistance given to asylum seekers, most of which is not even given as cash, but rather in the form of coupons and rent allowance. When local families experience difficulties in paying for childcare, they tend to fall back on their familial support network, mainly grandparents. As refugees usually do not have this kind of support in Cyprus, mothers have no choice but to stay at home taking care of young children. Even when the children are no longer infants, women still find it difficult to attend classes, which usually take place in the afternoon. Our research found the main barrier for women to be the fact that afternoon classes clash with their schedule, specifically, caring for their children after school. One interviewee confirmed this finding:

We need to design projects that cater to the needs of women. We need to take into account the fact that women are mothers and the main caregivers in their families.

Only one of our interviewees – an NGO representative – had taken steps to address the issue by designing a language training programme that would make things easier for primary caregivers:

It is easier for women to attend morning classes. Unfortunately, too many women are out of the labour market. Especially refugee women. In order to encourage the participation of women, we have incorporated morning classes in our future language training courses. The bulk of the courses will still be in the afternoons though.

The provision of training for refugee women can also be hindered by lack of attendance. Some feel that this is due to the stereotypical attitudes of male members of refugee households. For example, a public servant who was asked about the lower rate of participation of women in language courses provided by his institution, said:

---

<sup>14</sup> In the first 3 years of secondary education (gymnasium), 18 hours of Greek language classes are provided per week. In the final 3 years of secondary education (lyceum), 4 extra hours are provided per week. (Droushiotou and Mathioudakis, 2017).

Husbands do not let their wives attend the classes, because they are possessive and afraid of other men looking at their wives. Muslim culture, you know...

The research, however, has indicated that low attendance is far more likely to be due to practical considerations. Furthermore, women are in fact eager to learn the local language, one reason being to be able to help their children with their schoolwork.

Gender-blind language training policies not only have an impact on women's everyday lives but also on their access to justice. According to the CEDAW's 2018 observations on the Cyprus report, migrant, asylum seeking and refugee women face language barriers when claiming their rights. If women do not speak the language they are not able to represent and express themselves in front of the court, the police or a relevant authority. While provisions are in place to offer women victims of VAW an interpreter in court or at police stations, in practice, this is not always guaranteed. According to the same report (CEDAW, 2018) women, especially disadvantaged groups, such as migrants, asylum seekers and refugees, have limited access to free legal aid. Their lack of language skills can also limit the extent to which they are informed about protection policies and mechanisms that are available to them.

7. The Gender Dynamics of Labour Market Integration

Displaced migrants' access to the local labour market depends on their status. Recognised refugees and persons with subsidiary protection status must receive equal treatment as citizens of the Republic regarding paid employment; they are not restricted from working in any sector. Asylum seekers also have legal access to the labour market, but crucially, this is restricted to a small number of professions, mostly in agriculture, fishery, manufacturing, waste management, hospitality and wholesale trades and repairs. The starting point is to register at the Labour Office of the Ministry of Labour one month after they submit their application. The job-seeking process is as follows: The Labour Office sends the asylum seeker to a potential employer for an interview. Once the interview has been conducted, the potential employer fills in a feedback form, which we note does not include space for the interviewee to provide their own feedback on the meeting. The interviewee then has to report back to the Labour Office no matter the outcome of the interview. Not only are asylum seekers limited by law to low-skilled and low-paid jobs, they also face particular challenges in obtaining recognition of their educational and professional qualifications.

Although gender-segregated data on the employment rates of displaced migrants in Cyprus has yet to be collected, the OECD reported in 2016 that the employment rate of refugee women in Europe is 17% lower than that of refugee men, despite the fact that, among the arrivals in the last 10 years, they tend to be better qualified than their male counterparts. Refugee women also have a significantly lower rate of employment compared to EU women (OECD, 2016). Women refugees themselves seem to recognise the double disadvantage they have in accessing the labour market. A survey among refugees in Cyprus conducted in 2013 showed that women refugees felt that their gender was a barrier in accessing the labour market. On the contrary, refugee men did not feel that their gender is an additional obstacle in accessing the labour market (Officer and Taki, 2013).

Our research package on integration through the labour market has indicated that initiatives tailored for women's integration are still limited in Cyprus, despite evidence that such initiatives bring better results than gender-neutral ones (Bertelsmann, 2016a; Barslund et al, 2019). The research data has also indicated that integration policies remain gender blind, in that they do not cater to the specific needs of women displaced migrants in Cyprus. This is very problematic as fewer labour market opportunities lead to weaker social integration. As mentioned, Syrian migrants make up the highest percentage by nationality coming to Cyprus to seek asylum. At the same time, the economic activity rate of Syrian women stands at less than 15% in their country of origin. One study (Bertelsmann, 2016) points out that, in order to successfully integrate women in the labour market, host countries must consider the cultural background of displaced migrants. The lack of dedicated programmes for women means the state fails to take into consideration whether the migrant women – who are now expected to take up any work available to them – had been active in the labour market in their country of origin.

Gender-blind labour market integration policies in Cyprus also overlook migrant women's double role as family providers and caregivers. This has an impact not only on their access to the labour market but also, in the case of asylum seekers, on their access to material assistance. Several interviewees reported that women asylum seekers sometimes refuse job offers because these clash with their roles as mothers and caregivers, resulting in a loss of material assistance. According to one trade union representative:

What happens when the labour office sends a woman to a farm? She can't really go. We had a case where an asylum seeker had her material assistance cut off because she refused to work on a farm. It's crazy you know. They offered her a job in a field to harvest fruit, it was far away, in a village outside Nicosia, so she refused to go because she lived in Nicosia with her two babies and had no car.

As mentioned in section 6 of this report, women's exclusion is greatly exacerbated by the lack of public childcare services. Asylum seekers who are mothers are therefore severely limited in the work they can take on, at least until their children are of school age.

The support system also sometimes fails them due to a lack of interdepartmental coordination. According to some interviewees there have been incidents where the Labour Office did not register mothers who admitted to not being able to work because of the lack of childcare. The unfortunate knock-on effect is that the Social Welfare Service can only provide material assistance to those registered at the Labour Office as job seekers. Here we note that both the Social Welfare Services and the Labour Office are in the same ministry.

Childcare is not the only restriction women asylum seekers face in integrating into the labour market. Women face multiple forms of discrimination, including gender and religion. For example, women wearing hijabs have reported discriminatory incidents. A Syrian woman living in Cyprus said in a newspaper interview (Cyprus Mail, 2019):

Employers say if you want the job, take your hijab off and you will get it, and that's not fair to us. They don't respect us so we don't get the job.

As women and refugees, these migrants are at an acute disadvantage, highlighting the need to integrate female migrants who are not active in the EU labour market. As one NGO worker commented:

We hate to admit it, but we look at the world in gendered terms. Women have got all the migrant problems, they've got all the gender problems, they've got all the cultural problems, then they have the childcare problem.

7.1 A good practice on integrating refugee women in the labour market in Cyprus

The Dignity Centre is a drop-in space and women's cooperative for refugee and asylum seekers, run by Refugee Support Europe, an EU-wide volunteer organisation. Based in the old city of Nicosia, the centre offers a place to make clothes and fashion accessories, and also provides sewing classes three times a week, which are open to asylum seekers and refugees. The products are made available in the online shop<sup>15</sup>. Each product comes with a brief biography about the refugee maker. Makers get 80% of the shop's earnings and the remaining 20% goes to maintenance costs. The maker receives their share of the agreed fair trade price as soon as the item is put up for sale, even before a purchase is made. The initiative is very interesting and innovative as it not only helps refugee women gain a life skill, but also contributes to their socialisation and economic empowerment in a safe space.

Images source: refumade.org

<sup>15</sup> <https://refumade.org/>

8. Violence against Displaced Migrant Women

Women refugees and asylum seekers are often subjected to multiple forms of discrimination and are more vulnerable to sexual and gender-based violence in their countries of origin, transit and destination; whereas unaccompanied women and girls, women heads of household, pregnant women, people with disabilities and the elderly are particularly vulnerable.

European Parliament, 2016

Violence against women (VAW) is a global phenomenon of pandemic proportions across private and public spaces; it affects all women regardless of class, ethnic origin and migration status (UN Women, 2020). Migrant and refugee women are particularly vulnerable to experiencing violence<sup>16</sup>. The UNHCR, the United Nations Population Fund (UNFPA) and the Women's Refugee Commission recently assessed the risks for displaced migrants on their journey to Greece and onwards in Europe. They found that the women and girls, especially those travelling alone, face a particularly high risk of certain forms of violence in transit and destination countries, such as sexual violence by smugglers, as well as by criminal groups and individuals.

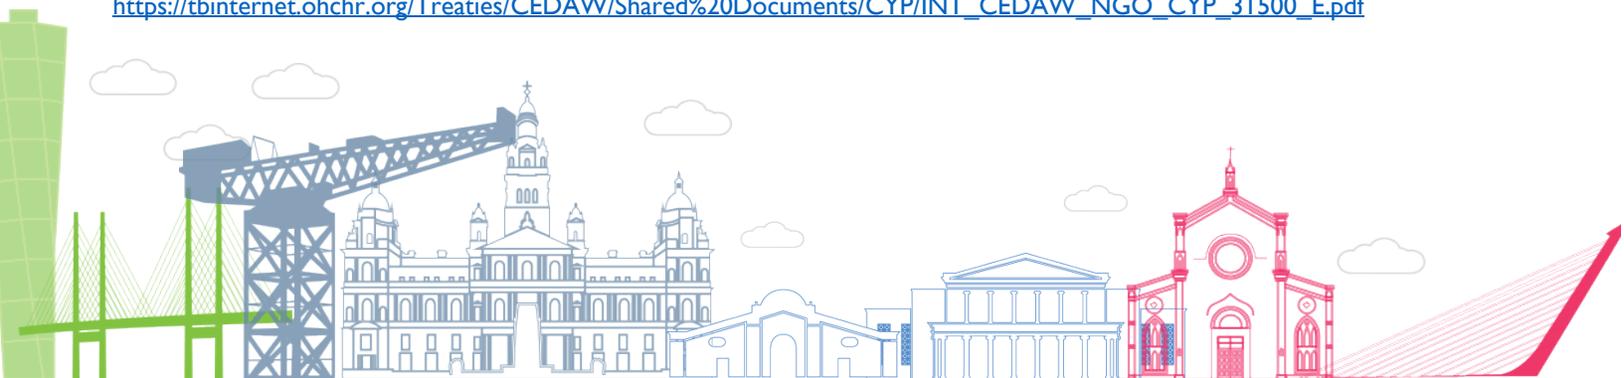

Despite the well-grounded evidence that refugee women are particularly vulnerable to violence, monitoring reports by the Council of Europe's Group of Experts on Action against Violence against Women and Domestic Violence (GREVIO) on the implementation of relevant provisions of the Istanbul Convention point to a lack of gender-sensitive migration and asylum policies and procedures across Europe (Gender Equality Commission, 2019). Cyprus, for example, has placed a reservation on Article 59 of the Istanbul Convention, which states that survivors whose residence status depends on that of a violent spouse or partner have the right to apply for a separate residence permit. According to the Ministry of Interior, the reason behind this reservation is the government's wariness that migrant women will claim being victims of violence in order access residence permits in Cyprus<sup>17</sup>. Pavlou and Christodoulou (2018) have refuted this claim, indicating that it is rooted in racist and sexist attitudes towards migrant women.

Violence experienced by displaced migrant women is often ignored due to the androcentric approach to migration and the low visibility of migrant women in host countries. Research throughout the GLIMER work streams have indicated a prevalence of VAW, with incidents ranging from sexual harassment upon arrival and during migration journeys; physical, sexual and psychological violence; intimate partner violence; to trafficking for sexual exploitation. Cases of VAW remain largely unreported, and even if they are reported, we often see that the authorities often turn a blind eye (Christodoulou and Michael, 2018).

---

<sup>16</sup> The term vulnerability is used here to emphasise the social structures around migration, reception and integration that put women in vulnerable positions.

<sup>17</sup> See Cyprus Women's Lobby Cyprus Shadow Report 2018. Available at https://tbinternet.ohchr.org/Treaties/CEDAW/Shared%20Documents/CYP/INT\_CEDAW\_NGO\_CYP\_31500\_E.pdf

8.1.2 Encouraging reporting of GBV against refugee women

Embrace Your Rights! is a project implemented by the Cyprus Refugee Council that aims to inform, support and encourage refugee women victims of GBV to report incidents. The project has produced a handbook aimed at professionals working with asylum seeking and refugee women, specifically on counselling victims of GBV. The project also offered training to improve professional capacity around recognising and dealing with GBV in the refugee context.

8.1.3 Combating female genital mutilation in Europe

The Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies (MIGS) actively lobbies local policymakers on FGM, including efforts to gender mainstream the European Asylum Support Office. It is also part of the pan-European movement to combat FGM both in countries of origin and in Europe. Among the ambassadors of the anti-FGM movement are asylum seekers and refugees who come from countries that practice FGM. In 2017, in collaboration with the Technological University in Cyprus, MIGS launched the UEFGM platform<sup>18</sup>. The UEFGM platform is designed as a practical tool to improve the knowledge and skills of professionals in Europe who are likely to come into contact with women and girls affected by FGM.

*Launch of the UEFGM platform in Nicosia, 2017.
Image source: House of the EP in Cyprus*

<sup>18</sup> www.uefgm.org

9. Conclusion

The lack of a solid and ongoing integration policy in Cyprus has left many migrant and refugee women and men struggling to find gainful employment, while also exposing them to much higher rates of homelessness and exploitation. Women also face multiple forms of discrimination, significantly fewer opportunities to integrate into host societies and a higher risk of experiencing violence. Research conducted by the GLIMER project has confirmed that, while displaced men and boy migrants face several challenges, women and girls face additional challenges that are based on their gender. GBV, sexism, childcare responsibilities, traditional gender roles and gender stereotypes are factors that put extra barriers to the integration of women displaced migrants in Cyprus.

We have provided evidence with this research that integration and protection policies in the Republic of Cyprus do not meet the needs of displaced migrant women and girls. This research revealed cases of VAW, homelessness and trafficking for sexual exploitation. Many interviewees felt that integration policies through language training, employment and vocational training do not cater to the needs of women. Most integration policies are gender neutral and therefore tend to be gender blind. Below, we outline some gender-specific recommendations that are in line with the needs and gaps we have identified throughout our research.

- Mainstreaming gender equality across integration policies in order to ensure that migrant women and men are benefiting equally and that the protection and integration needs of women displaced migrants are met.
- Immediate lifting of the reservation on Article 59 of the Council of Europe Convention on preventing and combating violence against women and domestic violence (Istanbul Convention). Article 59 is crucial as it provides for the protection of refugee women who are victims of violence against women and domestic violence as well as victims of forced marriage. The article specifically ensures that ‘victims may obtain the suspension of expulsion proceedings initiated in relation to a residence status dependent on that of the spouse or partner as recognised by internal law to enable them to apply for an autonomous residence permit’.
- Extend protection policies for unaccompanied girls as they enter adulthood and exit child protection institutions. Girls who leave the shelters for unaccompanied minors at the age of 18 find themselves highly vulnerable. Protection policies must be extended so as to mitigate the high risk of sexual exploitation or sexual abuse.
- Psychological support for refugee and asylum seeking women and girls who have been through trafficking and/or gender-based violence. All forms of GBV such as rape, harassment, female genital mutilation, domestic violence and trafficking cause severe pain, suffering and chronic trauma. Psychological support that is provided sporadically by a handful of Cyprus NGOs must be extended and integrated within wider national policy.
- Establish refugee women’s rights organisations. Our research has shown that the voices of refugee women are not heard when drafting integration policies. The needs of refugees are communicated to the central government either by NGOs or self-declared community representatives who are usually men. The facilitation of refugee women-led organisations will contribute to a power shift, enabling refugee women to speak and lobby for themselves.

- Inform women and men asylum seekers about their rights and integration policies. Asylum seekers must be better informed on integration programmes available to them at any given time, particularly those offering language training or improving their chances at labour market integration.
- Lift barriers for women accessing the labour market. Child care and negative stereotypes are the main barriers identified in our research regarding women accessing labour market. Measures should be put in place to combat negative stereotypes in the workplace (e.g. diversity charters). Childcare for pre-school aged children must also be made available so that women can attend classes in the afternoons.
- Provision of material assistance on an individual basis. Material assistance provided collectively to the male head of the family can be particularly problematic for women who are victims of domestic abuse. As such, alternative ways of providing material assistance on an individual basis, even to family units, must be offered.
- Awareness-raising to combat persistent racism and sexism through national campaigns and educational programmes.
- Support and funding for quantitative and qualitative research looking at gender-segregated data on the integration of displaced migrants and on violence against refugee women. Our research has clearly shown cases of policies resulting in unequal integration and incidents of VAW. Future research needs to go deeper in analysing both the extent of these phenomena, as well as the relevant protection and integration needs of displaced migrant women.

Disclaimer

This research was conducted within the framework of the European funded project entitled Governance and Local Integration of Migrants and Europe's Refugees (GLIMER). The content of this publication does not reflect the official opinion of the European Union. Responsibility for the information and views expressed in publication lies entirely with the authors.

For more information, contact:

Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies
 Makedonitissas Ave. 46, T.K. 24995, 1703 Nicosia Cyprus
 Email: info@medinstgenderstudies.org
 Website: www.medinstgenderstudies.org

References

- Advisory Committee on the Prevention and Handling of Domestic Violence (2012). Extent, Frequency, Nature and Consequences of Domestic Violence Against Women in Cyprus. Retrieved from: <http://www.familyviolence.gov.cy/cgibin/hweb?-A=971&-V=research>
- Angeli, M. (2015). Global Media Monitoring Project, Cyprus Report. WAAC Toronto & Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies.
- Angeli, M. (2019). Language Education for Asylum Seekers and Refugees in Cyprus: Provision and Governance. Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies. Nicosia: Glimer project. Retrieved from <http://www.glimer.eu/wp-content/uploads/2019/09/Cyprus>. [Accessed 9 March 2020].
- Barslund, M., Bartolomeo, A. D., Ludolph, D. (2017). Gender Inequality and Integration of Non-EU Migrants in the EU.
- Bertelsmann, S. (2016). From refugees to workers: mapping labour market integration support measures for asylum-seekers and refugees in EU member states. Volume II: Literature review and country case studies.
- Bilgili, Ö., Loschmann, C., Siegel, M. (2017). The Gender-Based Effects of Displacement: The Case of Congolese Refugees in Rwanda. KNOMAD Working Paper 21. World Bank
- Christodoulou, D. (1992). Inside the Economic Miracle. The Labours of an Embattled Economy. University of Minnesota.
- Christodoulou, J. and Michael, A. (2018). Integration Governance in Cyprus: Accommodation, Regeneration and Exclusion. Mediterranean Institute of Gender Studies. Nicosia: Glimer project. Retrieved from <http://www.glimer.eu/outputs/workpackage3/>. [Accessed 9 March 2020].
- Commissioner for the Rights of the Child, (2018) Έκθεση της Επιτρόπου, αναφορικά με την εκπροσώπηση των ασυνόδευτων ανηλίκων αιτητών ασύλου. Retrieved from: <https://bit.ly/2F8OIL8>. [Accessed 28 April 2020].
- Council of Europe (2019) Protecting the rights of migrant, refugee and asylum-seeking women and girls. Retrieved from <https://rm.coe.int/prems-089319-gbr-2573-protecting-the-rights-of-migrant-refugee-and-asy/168096608a> [Accessed 19 March 2020].
- Daoust, I., & Folkelius, K. (1996). UNHCR symposium on gender-based persecution. International Journal of Refugee Law, 8, 180-183.
- Daniely, D. L., & Lederman, S. (2019). Gendered Cultural Differences and Change in Gender Roles Among Displaced Refugees. Indian Journal of Gender Studies, 26(3), 364–384. A
- Emmenegger, P. and Stigwall, K. (2019). Women-Friendliness in European Asylum Policies: The Role of Women's Political Representation and Opposition to Non-EU Immigration. Comparative Political Studies, 52(9), pp.1293-1327.
- Executive Committee of the High Commissioner's Programme, Conclusion on Women and Girls at Risk No. 105 (LVII) - 2006, 6 October 2006, No. 105 (LVII), Retrieved from: <https://www.refworld.org/docid/45339d922.html> [Accessed 20 April 2020]
- European Institute for Gender Equality. (2019) Gender Equality Index. Retrieved from <https://eige.europa.eu/gender-equality-index/2019>. [Accessed 9 March 2020].
- European Institute for Gender Equality. (2016). Gender issues in the asylum claim. Retrieved from <http://eige.europa.eu/content/the-asylum-policy-instruction-gender-issues-in-theasylum-claim>

